PREPARATIONS FROM CORN

It is to be regretted that the food value of maize or ladian corn is not better understood and as fully appreciated by the working classes of the north as it is by all people native of the southern portion of our country, who greatly prefer their beloved golden co'n bread to the wheaten bread and stoutly maintain that purishing than the cold white product of nourishing than the cold white product of the north. We must admit that it cer-tainly is more nourishing and healthful than the average wheat bread that musquerades as the staff of life. Indian corn is undoubtedly a food of great mutritive value-experiments show-ing that it is well digested in the human body-90 per cent of its dry matter being absorbed, as compared with 82 per cent in the case of wheat. It has also the advantage of being an exceedingly eco-nomical food compared in price with wheat. And with the laboring man, who and be regarded as indispensable to his diet, for its fuel value is of almost the same proportion as wheat.

Nature seems to have arranged an ex-ceedingly nice adjustment in furnishing this food product for the people of a country possessing such varied climatic conditions as ours. The corn grown in the central and western states contains a very high percentage of starch and a little more oil than the wheat grain. On the other hand it is stated the corn exceeding the one they used in their previous tour, in massiveness and beauty. The setting of the first act is an exact previous tour, in massiveness and beauty. The setting of the first act is an exact property of the fir or rye, furnishing very nearly the neces-sities of life.

The chief objection to the corn grown in a colder climate is its very high per-centage of starch, which makes it the most fattening of cereals and of all foods except those exceedingly rich in oil or

The starchy property of corn meal makes it food of doubtful value only when it is subject to the frequent misdi-rected attempts to transform it into suitable sustenance for the body-for, like all other starchy food, it must be ex-ceedingly well cooked, and it also re-quires the full action of the saliva to put it in proper condition for further and complete digestion.

Dishes made of corn meal are seldom cooked enough, and no doubt one reason why the corn meal mush has fallen into disfavor is because of the slow process necessary in order to make it an easily digested and therefore, wholesome food. It being of a texture and consistency too easily swallowed, the first stage of digestion must depend more on the artificial or cooking process than the action of the artificial or cooking process than the action of the artificial or cooking process. of the saliva and, therefore, long cocking

Imitators

WHEN every store is selling a so-called "Shoe for Women" it does not mean that they have a demand for such a shoe from their customers.

It means simply that they realize the enormous success of the "Queen Quality" shoe and want to imitate that shoe and secure some of this trade.

BUT THEY CANNOT IMITATE IT

And if they could, do you want an imitation when you can have the original at no greater expense? It is a fact that most of the styles of shoes sold in the
